

To,

Ambika Bongirwar

on 11th September 2016

at 5:00pm

From,

Ambika Bongirwar

of BTech 1st year

Dear Ambika,

I hope you are not upset with mom.

Listen to her. She may hold you back when you try to speak or may not let you do what you think is right leaving you no choice other than doing what is told, but she knows what is good for you. In your future, you won't be left with any choice other than making your own decision and you will be given lot of freedom to speak. She has a bad temper because she is not feeling well, she doesn't know what's happening inside her and she can't help it. Please understand and take good care of her. Love is the only hope which can help her now. Explain her that her living is not a loss for us (I mean in terms of money). In her absence our family cannot thrive and all our lives will become miserable. Your thought that the operation was successful because of the surgeon is not true. It was because you letting mom know what you dreamt last night and that you cried in the exam hall thinking of her. Keep that up no matter what others think about you because it is not them who are gonna lose what you love. Cry if it is necessary and let mom know that you cried because even if you after you lose her, you won't get anything. Even dad is going to lie to you that she will be home soon. In fact, she won't be home at all and your home will no longer be your home because it will turn into a house. World is selfish and does the talking only for the sake of talking. Stop hating yourself if you succeed in this mission "Save mom", you have the best attitude I have ever experienced. So be yourself. Mom can become your best friend for life time if you think more maturely. Make her your best friend. Hoping that things are going to get better, I end this letter of mine.

---